

PUBLIC • PREMIUM

When You Give More Than You Get

There is a special kind of exhaustion that doesn't show up on blood tests. You're not just tired. You're drained. Because somewhere along the way, "kind" qui...

Abraham of London • 2026-04-27

There is a special kind of exhaustion that doesn't show up on blood tests.

You're not just tired. You're drained.

Because somewhere along the way, "kind" quietly morphed into "available", and "available" quietly morphed into "owned".

Here's the uncomfortable audit:

- Who checks on you first - without needing something?
- Who has actually changed because of all your advice, your support, your late-night calls?
- Who would notice if you finally stopped rescuing them?

If those answers hurt, you're not cruel. You're finally telling yourself the truth.

Love without boundaries is not love. It's leakage.

This week:

- Say no once where you'd normally say "of course".
- Leave one message unanswered until you genuinely have capacity.
- Ask yourself, "Would I let someone treat my child like this?" If the answer is no, you already know what needs to change.

You are not a bottomless well. You are a person.

And the people who only know how to drink will never teach you how to rest. You'll have to do that yourself.