

PUBLIC • PREMIUM

When Your Standards Keep You Lonely

Having standards is good. Low standards ruin lives. But there's a trap: sometimes "standards" become camouflage for fear. You don't just want quality people....

Abraham of London • 2026-04-27

Having standards is good.

Low standards ruin lives.

But there's a trap: sometimes "standards" become camouflage for fear.

You don't just want quality people. You want safety.

So you raise the bar so high nobody can reach you.

Here's the uncomfortable question:

Are your standards filtering out chaos - or filtering out intimacy?

Because real relationships require tolerance:

- for imperfect delivery
- for misunderstanding
- for human error

If your standard is "never disappoint me," you're not looking for a person. You're looking for an environment you can control.

This week, keep your standards - but check your walls:

- Identify one standard that is really a fear.
- Practice vulnerability once with someone safe.
- Allow one person to be human without disqualifying them.

Discernment is wisdom. But isolation is not a virtue.

Sometimes the thing you call "high standards" is just loneliness with good grammar.