Frontier Rule: Leader fatigue does not stay private. It moves outward into sequencing errors, tolerance for nonsense, and emotional volatility in the whole institution.

I. The Pressure Pattern

Executive fatigue is often discussed as a personal health issue. In reality it is also a governance issue, because the exhausted leader changes the decision environment for everybody else.

II. What This Pattern Actually Does

Fatigue distorts leadership in opposite directions. Some leaders become impulsive and over-escalatory. Others become avoidant and permissive. Both patterns damage resilience because the institution stops receiving consistent judgment.

III. Diagnostic Lens

The diagnostic questions are concrete. Are major decisions being delayed because the leader cannot face more complexity? Are weak proposals being approved because rejection feels too costly? Has the tone of correction become erratic?

IV. Strategic Implication

Resilient institutions do not romanticise depletion. They preserve the decision-making conditions leaders need in order to remain deliberate, morally clear, and capable of saying no at the right time.

V. Closing Judgment

When the top of the institution is exhausted, the whole system begins borrowing from future judgment. Frontier resilience requires leaders to treat fatigue as a strategic risk, not merely a personal inconvenience.
