Frontier Rule: If the temporary loss of one operator would create moral panic, the institution already has a resilience problem.

I. The Pressure Pattern

Key-person risk is often discussed in succession language, but the real issue is broader. An institution becomes fragile whenever too much memory, judgment, permission, or trust is concentrated inside one person.

II. What This Pattern Actually Does

That concentration may look efficient. It may even produce excellence. But under pressure it creates an intolerable dependency: the system can still function only if one individual remains consistently available, coherent, and willing to carry excess load.

III. Diagnostic Lens

Pressure-test the institution by asking which decisions, relationships, and operating memories would become unreliable if one named person stepped out for fourteen days. The answers reveal where resilience has been centralised rather than built.

IV. Strategic Implication

The purpose of the test is not to diminish strong operators. It is to honour reality. Serious institutions protect themselves by reducing concentration risk before crisis turns it into existential fragility.

V. Closing Judgment

The strongest person in the room is not the continuity plan. Frontier resilience begins when the institution stops admiring concentration risk and starts governing against it.
