**Sovereign Intelligence Signal**: Institutions are in danger when they begin making core decisions primarily to preserve the story being told about them.

I. The Governing Thesis

Narrative capture occurs when external perception becomes so dominant that the institution starts governing itself in service of the story rather than in service of reality. This can arise from market expectations, media attention, donor sentiment, political pressure, or investor mood.

II. Why This Pattern Distorts Judgment

Once narrative pressure dominates, leaders favour moves that are legible, marketable, or reassuring even when those moves weaken substance. Strategy turns performative. Internal truth becomes inconvenient because it complicates the external frame the institution has decided it must maintain.

III. Diagnostic Lens

The key question is whether the institution could take a necessary but narratively awkward decision without treating the reputational discomfort itself as disqualifying. If not, then story has started outranking truth.

IV. Operational Implications

Leadership should distinguish between narrative stewardship and narrative servitude. They should review which decisions are being shaped by fear of perception, where communications logic is outranking operating logic, and whether the institution still retains the courage to be briefly misunderstood in order to remain sound.

V. Closing Judgment

CONTROLLED CIRCULATION

Reputation matters. But the institution that lives inside the story told about it will eventually lose the strength to govern the reality beneath it.
