This is the moment most people avoid.

The moment you realise it wasn't just them.

It was you too.

Not as a victim-blaming slogan - but as an adult acknowledgement:

You participated. You enabled. You avoided. You chose.

Here's the mature truth:

You don't heal by being right. You heal by being honest.

Sometimes you weren't "too kind." You were people-pleasing.

Sometimes you weren't "patient." You were afraid of conflict.

Sometimes you weren't "loyal." You were attached.

This week, don't spiral into shame.

Do something better: take responsibility.

- Name one pattern you brought into the mess.
- Name one boundary you failed to enforce.
- Name one truth you ignored.

Then change one thing.

Not with a speech. With a decision.

Humility isn't thinking less of yourself. It's refusing to lie about yourself.

And once you can tell the truth about your part, you can finally stop repeating it.
