

PUBLIC • PREMIUM

When Your Convictions Feel Like Costumes

There comes a moment - quiet, dangerous, holy - when you realize you've been living as the public version of yourself. You still say all the right things. Yo...

Abraham of London • 2026-04-27

There comes a moment - quiet, dangerous, holy - when you realize you've been living as the public version of yourself.

You still say all the right things. You still preach the values you inherited. But in the unguarded moments, they feel borrowed.

It starts with tiny compromises:

- "Just this once."
- "Everyone else does it."
- "It doesn't really matter."

But compromise compounds. And one morning you look at your reflection and see a stranger wearing your convictions like theatre clothes.

This week, trade performance for truth:

- Identify one belief that feels like a costume.
- Ask: "Do I believe this... or do I just like the applause it gets me?"
- If the answer embarrasses you, good. That's the beginning of integrity, not the end of it.

Better three convictions you actually live than thirty you only display.