CONTROLLED CIRCULATION

I. The Governing Thesis

Field intelligence is the institution’s direct contact with changing conditions. It includes what customers are saying, where operations are straining, what competitors are doing, and which assumptions are quietly breaking.

II. Why This Pattern Distorts Judgment

This intelligence degrades when the edge learns that the centre either cannot absorb it, does not value it, or always translates it into pre-existing narratives. At that point local teams begin managing upward instead of informing upward.

III. Diagnostic Lens

The diagnostic is whether frontline observations can materially alter strategic discussion. If not, the field has become a symbolic input rather than a governing one.

IV. Operational Implications

The repair is to give local signal procedural dignity: structured channels, direct escalation paths for anomalies, and leadership routines that engage raw pattern before it is excessively interpreted.

V. Closing Judgment

The institution that loses field intelligence does not become more strategic. It becomes more abstract. And abstraction is costly when conditions start changing underfoot.
