It cannot indefinitely replace institutional sensing. ## I. The Governing Thesis In the early years, the founder often functioned as the primary source of institutional direction and sense-making. This role was critical in establishing the initial framework of the organization, which later evolved into a more formalized structure. The founder's vision and actions shaped the institution's identity and purpose, which in turn influenced its long-term success. This process of institutionalization is a key factor in the sustainability and growth of any organization. The founder's role is not just to create the institution but to ensure its resilience and adaptability over time. This requires a deep understanding of the institution's core values and a commitment to its mission. The founder must also be able to navigate the challenges of institutional change and maintain the institution's integrity in the face of external pressures. This is a complex task that requires a combination of vision, leadership, and strategic thinking. The founder's role is to provide a clear and compelling vision of the future and to inspire others to follow that vision. This is the essence of institutional leadership. The founder must also be able to build a strong and cohesive team that is committed to the institution's goals. Institutional Alpha Signal: Founder intuition can build an institution. It cannot indefinitely replace institutional sensing.

I. The Governing Thesis

In the early years, the founder often functions as the organisation’s intelligence system. He hears the market directly, notices drift quickly, and converts instinct into decisive action. This is a real strength, but it becomes a liability when scale multiplies complexity faster than instinct can absorb it.

II. Why This Pattern Distorts Judgment

The founder myth begins when the institution keeps treating central intuition as sufficient long after the operating environment has outgrown it. Teams then learn to route reality through the founder’s interpretation rather than developing stable sensing mechanisms of their own.

III. Diagnostic Lens

The practical diagnostic is whether key decisions still depend on proximity to the founder rather than on governed intelligence. If only one person can assemble the true picture, then the system is brittle by design.

IV. Operational Implications

The answer is not to dismiss intuition, but to discipline it. Founders should receive sharper intelligence, not more deference. Real maturity comes when the organisation can surface pattern, contradiction, and risk before the founder improvises the synthesis.

V. Closing Judgment

CONTROLLED CIRCULATION

A resilient institution honours founder strength without becoming captive to founder centrality. Intelligence must eventually become infrastructural, not personal.
