There's a version of you from ten years ago you secretly miss.

Not because they had more money, or better opportunities, but because they had something you're not sure you still have:

Uncomplicated joy. Reckless hope. Trust that hadn't yet been betrayed.

Here's the strange mercy:

You're not called to go back. You're called to become someone new who carries wisdom and softness.

That means:

- Learning how to hope with your eyes open.
- Choosing tenderness without pretending you weren't hurt.
- Letting God heal what experience has armoured.

You don't need to resurrect the old you. You need to meet the healed you.

Tonight:

- Write down three things you miss about that earlier version of you.
- Ask which of them were naivety and which were genuine virtues.
- Ask God to restore the virtues without the blindness.

You're not regressing by wanting softness back. You're refusing to let pain be the final architect of your personality.
